Meet Richard and Jennifer

Richard and Jennifer are in their sixties, and their financial adviser has recommended that they start to consider inheritance tax (IHT) planning to maximise their children's inheritance.

Their adviser informs them that their estate is worth £3 million, which would mean a significant IHT liability of £940,000 after their nil-rate bands have been deducted.

Initially they were looking at trust based planning, but they were dissuaded by the 20% CLT for trusts over £325,000. They were considering gifting £1 million to a Trust, which would have meant an upfront charge of £200,000. Their priority is wealth preservation, and they ideally want to avoid paying a 20% tax charge; especially as there is a possibility that their beneficiaries would have to pay further tax on their estate.

Further tax would be due if Richard and Jennifer are not able to survive the seven years required for gifts to be free from IHT.

Their adviser suggested that if they were to invest their capital in Business Relief (BR) qualifying activities for two years, they could then review the situation and decide whether they wish to transfer their qualifying assets into a trust without being liable to the CLT charge. They are aware that they can continue to hold the assets free from IHT outside a Trust and retain ownership, access and control during their lifetimes.
